The Faema E61 Jubilé at work...

1901 | 1935 | 1938 | 1961

The first prototype of the espresso machine was presented at the World Exhibition in Paris in 1855, large, shiny colossi made of brass and copper, with the Italian imperial eagle on top.

The loss of aroma and slowness of traditional coffee preparation should be eliminated. The catering trade was particularly interested in preparing coffee in the shortest possible time and maintaining an even better aroma.

The flow of water through the coffee should be accelerated using strong pressure. The necessary pressure began to be created in various ways.

1901 The first espresso machine manufacturer on an industrial basis was the Italian company Bezzera (1901). Luigi Bezzera patented a machine consisting of 4 "groups" and a boiler. Different filter sizes fit into each "brewing group". Boiling water and steam were forced through the coffee powder. The pressure had to be skillfully metered using various valves.

In 1903 Bezzera's patent was acquired by Desiderio Pavoni.

In 1905, La Pavoni began production using the same principle.

1935 In order to simplify operation and to prevent the coffee from burning due to the high temperatures, Francesco Illy designed the "Illetta" model in 1935. With automatic water dosing, it was the first automatic espresso machine. The pressure was no longer generated by steam, but by compressed air. This made it possible to separate the heat and pressure sources, which prevented the ground coffee from burning.

In 1938 Cremonesi invented another principle: a large spring that was activated by a lever pushes a piston that compresses the water. This model was first used in Achille Gaggia's Caffè Bar, but World War II temporarily prevented further development. In 1946 Gaggia begins production of the piston model. For the first time, the coffee has a foam layer, the "crema". A classic from Gaggia with 3 brewing groups.

Preparing the espresso was a real effort!

In 1961 Ernesto Valente replaced the spring again with an electronically operated rotary pump. Now the water was cold compressed until it reached the heat exchanger of the machine's boiler. In 1961, Faema began producing pump-operated machines. Water is sucked directly from the water connection into a pipe that runs through the boiler and then distributes the water to the coffee. This means that the water maintains the optimal temperature of 90°C, is filtered and does not remain in the boiler for a long time. This principle was completed with the famous Faema E 61 brewing group (1961), which enabled continuous coffee delivery.

Faema's E61, it is the prototype of all modern espresso machines. Almost all current machines are based on this principle, both in the catering industry and for domestic use. The hydraulic and lever models are also occasionally in operation.

To mark the anniversary of the legendary E61, Faema has brought the "Jubilé E61" model onto the market in a retro design. It combines the latest technology with the traditional art of espresso preparation. See for yourself, here with us.....in the CAPPUCCINO - Gengenbach - Café-Bistro-Cocktailbar - since 1985.

Story of tea

Just like the story of coffee, the history of tea is based on many legends. The only thing that is actually certain is that the country of origin of tea must be China. Europe received its first tea through the Dutch, who had purchased it in Japan and shipped it from Amsterdam in 1610. Around 1635, the beverage became known in France, then in Russia, and only by 1650 was tea available in England. At that time, only the wealthy could afford tea. In England, a battle took place between supporters of the new drink and opponents who predicted all kinds of harm for tea drinkers. Yet it was precisely these disputes that probably helped tea spread worldwide. It conquered the coffeehouses in London, where soon more tea was consumed than coffee.

The Boston tea Party

It would become the trigger for the War of Independence between the English colonies in North America and England itself. The conflict was about taxes that those who had to pay them considered unfair. Tea, like all other British goods, suffered under high import duties and defiant boycotts. In 1773, English ships loaded with a huge amount of tea were boarded in the port of Boston, and the opened tea crates were dumped into the sea. The American War of Independence began and through this "Tea War" led to today's world power, the USA.
